

CEP Magazine – May 2020 Emission battle in United States reaches standstill

By Sascha Matuszak

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration and the Environmental Protection Agency are battling over a new auto emissions rule.^[1] The interagency dispute has delayed action by the United States federal government in a conflict that has split automobile manufacturers and pit California and more than a dozen states against the Trump administration.

This document is only available to members. Please log in or become a member.

Become a Member Login