

CEP Magazine – June 2020 Washington state enacts regulations on facial recognition technology

By Sascha Matuszak

In a move that will likely influence many other states, and perhaps the federal government, the state of Washington’s governor, Jay Inslee, signed a bill^[1] into law that regulates the use of facial recognition technology. The Wall Street Journal summarizes some of the law’s requirements in their exclusive daily report on artificial intelligence below:^[2]

- “Under the new law, if a government agency wants to use facial recognition, it has to first give public notice, hold at least three community meetings and publish a report outlining the technology’s potential impact on civil liberties.
- “Police could use facial recognition for ongoing surveillance or real-time identification of people, but they will need a warrant or court order first.
- “The technology can’t be used to make significant government decisions without ‘meaningful human review,’ and government employees must be trained on the technology’s limitations.”

This document is only available to members. Please log in or become a member.

Become a Member Login